The months went by, and Little Vie showed more promise with every week that passed. When he came out of the stable for his early morning workout his head was always high, his ears pointed forward, and his eyes seemed fixed on something far off that only he could see.

One morning Pony leaned forward on the colt's neck and whispered to him, "What is it you see, fellow? Is it the Gold Cup shining way out there ahead somewhere? Maybe it's a new track record you see set up on a board in the sky. That would be the best yet. A new world's record. Can you feel it in your bones already, Little Vic?"

That morning as he rode the colt around the track Pony dreamed that he was wearing the brightly colored silks of some great stable and that Little Vic, with Pony up, was breaking the wire in front of a roaring grandstand
