作者介绍:

Fyodor Aleksandrovich Abramov -(Russian: Фёдор Александрович Абрамов) (February 29, 1920 – May 14, 1983) was a Russian novelist and literary critic. His work focused on the difficult lives of the Russian peasant class. He was frequently reprimanded for deviations from Soviet policy on writing.

Abramov was from a peasant background. He studied at Leningrad State University, but put his schooling on hold to serve as a soldier in World War II. In 1951 he finished his schooling at the university, then remained as a teacher until 1960. After he left the university he became a full-time writer.

His essay, written in 1954, "Lyudi kolkhoznoy derevni v poslevoyennoy" ( “People in the Kolkhoz Village in Postwar Prose” ), which addressed the glorified portrayal of life in Communist Soviet Villages, was denounced by the Writers' Union and the Central Committee. In a later essay, Abramov argued for the repeal of the law that denied peasants internal passports; he also recommended giving the peasantry larger shares of the profits of their labors. This essay led to his removal from the editorial staff of the journal Neva.

His first novel entitled, "Bratya i syostri" ("Brothers and Sisters") was written in 1958. It dealt with the harsh life of northern Russian villagers during World War II. Abramov wrote two sequels to "Bratya i syostri". Entitled, "Dve zimy i tri leta" ("Two Winters and Three Summers") and "Puti-pereputya" ( “Paths and Crossroads” ). Written in 1968 and 1973 respectively. He also wrote a fourth novel in 1978 called "Dom" ("The House")

Abramov started another novel, "Chistaya kniga", but did not finished it before his death in May 1983.

A minor planet 3409 Abramov discovered by Soviet astronomer Nikolai Stepanovich Chernykh in 1977 is named after him.

看在我这样的后人眼里，这故事就是对当时的官僚主义和计划经济体制的最好批判。其中有正直和善良，但正直和善良从未成为时代的主流；但即便如此，这故事里的很多人还是各有各的可爱，他们都是典型的北方儿女，有着地域所给予的独特风情。我们，也是应该可以写出类似的故事来的吧。
