The United States, Germany, and Japan - the world's three most powerful and successful free market societies - differ strikingly in how their governments relate to their economies. Comparing Policy Networks reports the results of collaborative research by three teams investigating the social organization and policymaking processes of national labor policy domains in the United States, Germany, and Japan during the 1980s. The researchers gathered information about policy goals, communication patterns, and political support connections from 350 key national organizations, including labor unions, business associations, public interest groups, government agencies, and political parties. These networks reveal similar conflict divisions between business and labor interests, but also distinctive patterns within each nation. Unique combinations of informal policy-making networks and the national political institutions may in part explain the differences in power structures and legislative decisions.

想起来，这一领域的议题已经在日本政治学主流期刊和会议中很久都没有见到了。想起来，有一点的确是真实的，在日本政治的场合，很多政治活动是“不可见”的，不独一般市民，学者也很少意识到这一点。不过，现在的厚生劳动省，的确大概仅有厚生两个字，而已经让人意识不到还有劳动分野的存在了（和90年代之前正好相反）
