Scobie provides a personal survey, a discussion, and an analytical assessment of the myth of Paris, city of lights, as seen through the writings of various English-Canadian and American expatriates of the 20th century. He also gives us glimpses of urban planning and a touching homage to his deceased wife. The stance and tone of this book shift from chapter to chapter - sometimes as literary criticism, sometimes as cultural history, sometimes as personal memoir. What holds the book together is Paris itself: A fluid and engaging mixture of literary criticism and personal experience, deftly written and lovingly researched.
