Both within Romantic literary studies and within early twenty-first century world literature and politics etc., migration (emigration/immigration) is on the forefront. The recovery of emigration/immigration records and history allows for exciting new readings of canonical and non-canonical literary texts. Analyzing real, speculative, and imaginary schemes of migration to and from Britain, this book addresses three interrelated movements: between France and Britain after the French Revolution, between Britain and North America also after the Revolution, and between West Africa and Britain in the years leading to the Revolution.
