Our new Coping titles will keep you abreast of difficult situations and how to deal with them. Although wearing glasses has become a less traumatic experience than it used to be for teens -- frames are more stylish and contacts are more popular and affordable -- finding out that one's vision is imperfect or declining is still a shocking event, especially if a teen faces the threat of blindness. Vision problems, genetic disorders, and age-related disorders are all explained, as are the emotional responses most often provoked. A teen will be able not only to accept but understand his or her, or someone else's, vision disorder.
