Steve Harris, an Army Ranger, commits necessary but morally wrong acts to keep himself and his troops alive. His moral compass becomes shattered after he kills two small children who were riding in the car with their parents during a suicide bombing mission. His actions saved his troops, but forever broke him. He gets awarded the Silver Star for something that he thinks should have earned him an eternity in hell. After the military, he is faced with the reality of having to get a job, with little formal education. It is only when Peter, a former commander offers him a position as an Air Marshal that he figures out his true destiny; to serve his country, not his morals or religion. To be the person they need him to be, he must battle against his id and superego which take the forms of Agent Felder, an FBI Agent, and Timothy Volk, an old military buddy. They pull him in different directions as Felder directs him to do the correct thing for his country and Volk guides him to do the right thing for humanity. As an Air Marshal Steve continues carrying out orders he knows are wrong. He delves deeper into vigilante justice until he becomes as evil as the people he pursues. His quest for justice and his disdain for a society consumed by greed turn him into a calculating serial killer on the loose with a badge that offers him no accountability, no rules and no limits. Each character is theologically based in this thriller. Deluded Angels leaves behind the gadgetry and fantasy of spying and replaces it with heart pumping action and jaw dropping narrative that only someone who has been there can write.
